

The manuscript page contains several lines of text written in a cursive hand. The text is mirrored across the page, appearing to be bleed-through from the reverse side. The words are difficult to decipher due to the cursive style and the mirroring effect.

In the middle section, there are two distinct signatures or names written in cursive. One appears to be 'John' and the other 'James', though they are partially obscured and mirrored.

The lower portion of the page features a large, highly decorative flourish or signature that spans across the width of the page. This flourish is also mirrored. Below it, there are several more lines of cursive text, which are also mirrored and difficult to read.
