

The first part of the manuscript is written in a cursive hand, featuring several lines of text that are heavily crossed out with multiple overlapping diagonal and horizontal strokes. The ink is dark, and the paper shows signs of age and wear.

A single line of text, possibly a signature or a date, is written in the center of the page. It is partially obscured by a large, irregular brown stain that covers a significant portion of the middle section of the document.

The lower portion of the page contains several more lines of handwritten text. Like the top section, these lines are also heavily crossed out with multiple overlapping strokes, making the original text largely illegible. The handwriting remains consistent with the cursive style seen in the upper part of the page.

