

Indians of the mountains of the Andes were the descendants of the Indians who had been taken captive by the Incas and had settled in the mountains of the Andes. They had been converted to Christianity by the Spaniards and had adopted their language. They had established themselves in various parts of the Andes, particularly in the Andean mountains, where they had established their communities and had adopted their language.

They had adopted the language of the Andes and had established themselves in various parts of the Andes, particularly
 in the Andean mountains, where they had established their communities and had adopted their language.

They had adopted the language of the Andes and had
 established themselves in various parts of the Andes, particularly
 in the Andean mountains, where they had established their communities and had adopted their language.

They had adopted the language of the Andes and had
 established themselves in various parts of the Andes, particularly
 in the Andean mountains, where they had established their communities and had adopted their language.

They had adopted the language of the Andes and had
 established themselves in various parts of the Andes, particularly
 in the Andean mountains, where they had established their communities and had adopted their language.